nunciation of a common and mischieyous disposition is uttered by Rev. F. De Witt Talmage in the following sermon on the text Proverbs vi. 34, "Jealousy Is the rage of a man:"

What does rage signify? Righteous indignation? A calm, dispassionate arraignment or castigation? A denunciation, judiciously planned and yet overwhelmpgly and scathingly delivered, as when Edmund Burke exposed the misdeeds of Warren Hastings in the famous trial at Westminster? A rebuke such as Jesus gave to the Pharisees. who had dragged a poor, helpless, friendless, sinful woman to his feet, when he turned and said to the accusers, "Let him that is without sin cast the first stone at her?" Is rage merely a mild remonstrance, an earnest and vet gentle expostulation, a hortatory admonition, a Christian reprimand given with the holy desire to save and redeem the person who has sinned or unintentionally done wrong? Oh, no! Rage is not a well composed censure. Rage is unbridled fury; rage is a fierce. wild, all consuming, flery passion burning at the heart and mind; rage is a demon stabbing at the vitals of all true love; rage is a Satanic iconoclast shattering every sacred shrine of the intellect; rage is an insanity, a derangement of moral sensibilities. It is an unreasonable and unreasoning frenzy, glorying in absurd hallucinations. Rage's throneroom is a madhouse; rage's courtiers are the inhabitants of a chamber of horrors; rage's only music is the echoing shricks and sobs of the eternally lost and of the destroyed who can never die Now, as rage is nothing more nor less I once saw chained to the seat of a railroad train. Behind this seat I rode for many miles on a journey from Detroit to Washington. It was one of the most awful days I ever spent. As I sat in the train reading, the officers of the law dragged up the aisle a great. strong limbed, powerfully framed, half breed Indian. He had a noble brow and a masterful face, but his eyes were like burning coals. His white teeth gleamed like the molars of a wild beast. This madman was a graduate of the Carlisle school. As a monomaniac may be rational on every subject but one, so the jealous man may be fair and just on every question, but be absolutely insane and unjust when the works and lives of his successful rivals are discussed. If you are a jealous man, you will turn upon them all your batteries of scorn and denunciation. You will magnify their faults and gloat over their imperfections, you will loathe them with an unutterable loathing, and when, on account of your unjust criticisms, you may have overthrown s successful rival, you, as a jealous man, will join in the pandemonium of a demoniacal joy in which all the cyll spirits of the inferno join in the chorus. You will gleefully clap your hands and shout: "Abs. we have destroyed him! We have destroyed the man who has dared to stand in our way!"

In all the writings and speeches of William McKinley, delivered or written during a public life of more than thirty years, you cannot find one word by which he tried to win success by wrecking the life of a rival. He achieved success by helping along every good man he could. That the philosophy of the Golden > ous of others is illustrated in the life of Dwight L. Moody. What made Mr. Moody in some respects the greatest religious one man power in the last century? His speaking ability? Oh, yes! I believe he was one of the most convincing of spiritual orators, but I also believe that there were others of his time just as great, if not greater. His organizing ability? Oh, yes! I believe he would have been a master at the head of a political campaign or as a merchant or even as a military chieftain: but, though D. L. Moody may have been a great organizer, I believe there were others of his time just as great, if not greater. His great big beart, into which he could gather all his loved ones? Oh, yes; Mr. Moody had an affectionate nature! But there are thousands of men who love their families and friends just as much as Mr. Moody loved his loved ones; but, though many men may have excelled him in individual characteristics, in one respect I believe he was the peer, if not the king, of them all. I do not believe Mr. Moody had one infinitesimal particle of jealousy in his makeup. Instead of trying to focus all the attention of the religious world upon himself he spent most of his life in pushing other religious workers to the front. The bigger the man the more anxious Mr. Moody was to call public attention to him. He brought across the water Henry Drummond and John McNeill and F. B. Meyer and G. H. C. McGregor and Campbell-Morgan and many others. He invited to his own platforms the mightlest religious workers of his generation. He placed them by his side as he said Brother in Christ, win a mighty gospel victory. I am praying for you. The bigger success you have the happier I

Why Moody Sneceeded.

What was the inevitable result? When Mr. Moody tried to advance these Christian workers, whom some people might have called his rivals, he advanced himself into the hearts of sinful men and women as well as into the chief human leadership of the Christian world. Many contemporaries may have excelled him in individual and particular gifts, but in mighty masterful leadership, in the fame and eminence which will cause his name to go down through the coming cen turies as a Christian worker, in his in fluence upon the men of his day, Mr. Moody stood head and shoulders above all the Christian workers of his time. He won this enviable position because he did not have a particle of jealousy h his makeup. He won it because be

It is the cause of most of the sistible flood of remorseful tears. A Causeless Frensy. The saddest part of these insane afflictions, where men and women will sometimes turn upon their best friends and brood over the idea that they are untrue, is that often their frenzied surmises are without any legitimate cause. They may only be the stage hallucinations of a diseased intellect. Their loved ones may be doing everything in their power for their sick minds; they may take them to the most expensive of asylums and have for them the best of physicians and nurses; they may continually visit them and have their rooms filled with flowers and have carish their money in every possible way for the comfort of their weak minded relations, yet these insane patients can never be persuaded that their friends are faithful to them. Though husbands and wives and children may be doing everything that can be done for their happiness, yet they will keep on in their upbraidings and fault findings and denunciations until at last they will drive those who are nearest and dearest to them from their sides. No impression will cause a husband to despise a wife quicker than the belief that she distrusts him and will not credit what he says; no knowledge on earth will send a young woman to destruction sooner than the thought that the man she married has dropped the role of a lover for that of a sneaking detective. Continual fault finding and false accusations and frenzied distrust and venomous sneers and multitudinous reproaches and sulky broodings always defeat their own ends with our loved ones as jealousy also defeats its own aim in our treacherous dealings with our hated rivals. The rattlesnake's fang is a poor receptacle in which to store the honey of an orange blossom. The most virulent forms of maddening jealousy can often be found among the old as well as among the young. The superintendents of the great insane asylums will tell you that some of their patients have been living in charge of their keepers for ten, twenty, thirty and sometimes even forty or
